

When you're ready to leave, say 'hi' to new mobile app

People use their mobile devices for seemingly everything these days: scheduling appointments, social media communications, and as a source of entertainment. Some phones are even used for an occasional phone call.

But what if federal workers had a mobile app at their disposal – literally at the reach of their fingertips – to track their leave? Wouldn't that be a handy, useful and relevant function for mobile devices? Most certainly it would.

Now, thanks to its burgeoning mobile apps efforts, GEICO has made strides to keep pace with the fast-moving technophile with a new mobile app that's a means to two of the company's ends – maintaining strong ties to federal employees, and keeping up with the technological acumen of the 21st century customer.

The new app helps federal workers keep track of their vacation, holiday and sick leave. Built and designed by GEICO's mobile team, the federal leave app is currently available to iPhone, BlackBerry and Android-device users.

Here's how it works: once the app is downloaded, customers can enter their initial balances of leave and their accrual rates for sick and annual leave. From there, the app automatically calculates annual and sick leave accrual. Customers have the ability to account for days out of the office and add credit and comp time to keep their card up to date.

Customers can also send the information that appears on the leave card via e-mail and connect with other federal employees via the GEICO Federal Facebook page.

GEICO has provided leave cards to federal employees free of charge for more than 50 years to help them track their annual leave. Now, with GEICO's mobile federal leave app, federal employees can push a few buttons and plan vacations, check sick leave when they've fallen ill, and handle other leave-related matters.
